

Suburb Profile

O'Connor 6163

The suburb of O'Connor was named in 1955 in honour of Charles Yelverton O'Connor. O'Connor was Engineer in Chief and General Manager of the railways of Western Australia in the 1890s and is remembered for his genius that resulted in the construction of the Goldfields Water Supply, Fremantle Harbour and Perth's suburban rail system. He died in 1903.

O'Connor is known more as a light industrial zone, featuring a variety of outlets, many involved in the food manufacturing business. Housing was part of the original plan for the area in the 1940s and, in recent years, O'Connor has come into its own with thriving residential and commercial pockets.

A mix of small retail stores along with large chain department stores offering household and electrical appliances, have come to the fore in the retail sector while well-planned residential areas, complete with parks, playgrounds and other facilities, have been integrated into the suburb.
